TWENTY FIVE

We've gathered 25 exhibitions, happenings and moments that have caught our attention — and we think they'll capture yours, too.

Wide Angle

David Maisel's The Lake Project 24, 2002

As our environment changes at a rapid pace, so do the methods by which we capture it. In "New Territory," a survey show at the Denver Art Museum on view from June 24 through September 16, visitors are invited to observe this expedited progression through the lens of 80 international photographers who are rethinking the landscape as both a context and a subject.

La Torre de David, 2010, is a photograph from Venezuelan collaborators Ángela Bonadies and Juan José Olavarria's project investigating Caracas's Tower of David, which was designed as a financial center, but is now home to thousands of squatters.

This August, the ghost of Georgia O'Keeffe will have to step aside for the new generation of voices flooding her hometown for Sitelines 2018, Site Santa Fe's biennial focused on contemporary art of the Americas. Helmed by three curators this year, José Luis Blondet, Candice Hopkins and Ruba Katrib, the show is titled "Casa Tomada," taking its name from Julio Cortazar's haunting tale of a house with a mind of its own. The featured artists will play with the relationship between what stays and what goes. Visitors can expect to see a variety of new works, including commissions by Sable Elyse Smith, Eduardo Navarro and Lutz Bacher.

Skyscrapers

Martha Diamond's cityscapes do not deal in pretension, but rather a bluntness that allows for active interpretation on the part of the viewer. This summer, Galerie Eva Presenhuber's space on Great Jones Street in New York transforms itself into a kind of skyline with a suite of new paintings that will swallow the urbanite whole.
